Latest News: French Government Campaign against Black Friday Sales and Fast-Fashion

French government launched a campaign to encourage people not to buy new clothes in the Black Friday sales over the coming weeks. The advert shows a man asking for advices in a shop before an assistant says him not to buy anything in order to help the planet and his finances.

The message is receiving mixed reactions since the launch of the campaign. Some are believing that the message is a positive step in helping people to be more sensible with their money. However, the French Finance Minister has warned that the campaign could harm honest businesses.

This campaign is one of many similar initiatives that the current French government launched so far. Last year, the government launched a “repair bonus” encouraging people to repair their existing clothes instead to buy new ones.
