The Decline of London's "Cockney" Accent

London's famous Cockney accent was once speaking all across Britain's huge capital. It was iconic in British popular culture for decades, and its dialectal words, known as 'Cockney rhyming slang', were well-known across the whole country.

However, the much-loved accent becomes much less common according a study carried out by experts at the University of Essex. Linguists made a research on a sample of 193 people across London, and used algorithms to group participants based on the vowel sounds what they used in their speech.

They found that Cockney was hardly spoken by any of the younger participants in the study. It appears that the accent is slowly replaced by 2 newer accents, namely Estuary English and Multicultural London English (or MLE). Both of these accents have very similar sounds comparing to Cockney, but they have also adapted features from other languages and dialects, reflecting London's cultural diversity. If you will visit London in the near future, be sure to listen out for the range of accents!
