Returning to the Office

The employees at major tech companies are the most well positioned to keep working from home – and tech companies even created the tools to do so. Yet, in an astonishing move, some companies such as Zoom and Meta urge workers back to their desks.

In August, tech company Zoom has told employees that in case they are not willing to return to the office for 2 days a week, they will lose their jobs.

Since the announcement, 50% of the company's employees are fired for refusing to comply. The willingness of Zoom to lose half of its employees over the issue has come as a shock to many people.

Some employees are extremely frustrating that Zoom isn't listening their individual situations. Some people took up positions at Zoom despite they lived far away from the company's headquarters. They didn't know that Zoom would suddenly u-turn on its policy and force people back to the office: "If I would have known about this before, I would never have taken up a position at Zoom", said one angry employee.
