Latest News: New Zealand Smoking Ban U-Turn

The New Zealand government has been criticising for reversing plans to ban the sale of cigarettes to anyone what was born after 2008.

If the law would have been introduced, adults would have allowed to continue buying cigarettes, but anyone born after 2008 would have never been allowed to buy them. It would have been the first such law in the world to ban the sale of cigarettes completely to a certain age group.

Since the shocking u-turn, health experts are criticising the government, saying that it is a step in the wrong direction. Others have gone further, claiming that the government don't interest to the health of the population.

However, not everyone criticises the move. Business groups and owners of newsagents believe that the government has done the correct decision, claiming that cancelling the ban has saved their businesses.
