Italy's Other Leaning Tower: Fears that Bologna's Garisenda Tower Could Collapse

A medieval tower in the Italian city of Bologna, which leans by as much as the famous tower in Pisa, was closed off due to fears that it could soon collapse.

The tower is leaning since the 14th century, but last October sensors recorded some slight changes in the angle of the building, suggesting that it is in danger of falling.

After extensive discussions, authorities have done the decision to build a high barrier around the tower just in case it will fall.

After build the barrier, the city council will then need to invest millions to reconstruction work in order to preserve the tower for people to enjoy in the future. The whole situation could prove to be very costly for the city of Bologna, but it is certainly worth to protect such a beautiful tower, which is enjoying by thousands of visitors every year.
